Optimizing the immune surveillance of the developing retinal pigment epithelium. Antigen-presenting cells (APCs) of the retina, such as microglia, are thought to function as sentinels for the developing retina. As such, they are known to be involved in immune privilege, protection from T-cell-mediated rejection, and the regulation of homeostasis in the retina. To understand how APCs may mediate these effects, the authors have studied APC immunophenotyping and function in the mouse retina. They found that APCs of the retina were phenotypically diverse, and that
