VZEnhanced 56K is a tiny utility designed to help you block incoming phone calls based on multiple factors, such as caller ID or range of phone numbers. The idea behind the program is to provide you with a means to manage all those unsolicited calls that you might be getting from telemarketers, call centers or scammers. You can get started by creating a contact list as well as the allowed and ignored list. You can add as many details about a caller as possible, just in case they decide to call you after a while and you do not remember who they are anymore. You should know that you are able to ignore incoming calls as they happen as well. If you happen to get an unsolicited call for example, you can right click on the number in the Call Log and ignore it, which means the you get disconnected from the caller right away. You can preview all calls, including the blocked ones, on the dedicated log Sometimes, it may happen that you added the number of a friend or a loved one on the ignore list accidentally. Do not fret, as you can check put all your calls which include the ones that you blocked in the Call Log window. The standard calls are displayed in black, whereas the blocked or redirected ones in red, so you can easily notice if you did something wrong. The invention further relates to methods of making thermoplastic polyester compositions containing polyester reactive oligomer. Conventional fiber-forming polyesters, for example, poly(ethylene terephthalate), commonly referred to as polyester, or PET, are frequently used to form and manufacture products including containers, fibers, films, sheets, and molded or cast parts. PET is normally prepared by reacting a dihydroxy monomer, e.g., ethylene glycol, with terephthalic acid or an ester thereof, or, for example, by reacting a dicarboxylic acid with a dihydroxy monomer. Polyester is normally prepared by interfacial polymerization or polycondensation. Polyesters are advantageously used in part because their long chain structure results in many desirable properties. Particularly, polyester fibers, for example, have high strength and good resistance to water and chemicals and exhibit high durability to heat and light. Polyesters are not, however, without disadvantages. For example, polyester has a high moisture permeability, it can have a tendency to be hazy, and it generally exhibits poor toughness and a lower environmental stress crack resistance (ESCR) than that of polyethylene and polypropylene. Polyester can be made intrinsically flame-retardant. Intrinsically flame-retardant polyesters are made with a halogenated or non-halogenated synergist. A synergist is a material, such as an organic phosphate or a phosphorus-containing organic compound, that in combination with a halogenated or non-halogenated flame retardant synergist, such as a brominated or non-brominated compound, generally provides an added benefit not achievable with the individual flame retardant alone. The synergistic aid not only improves flame-retardancy, but also results in better physical properties. In general, these polyesters provide improved heat distortion and toughness, along with acceptable chemical resistance, good
