The reputation of a medical or health care facility is determined in large part by patient care, by the competence and character of its employees and by the standards of best practice in the nation or region. These factors, plus the fact that health care costs have increased substantially, now call for the most careful and detailed examination of the performance of any medical facility, including dental schools. The notion of "quality assurance" has been widely defined.

A unique aspect of the dental profession in North America is the absence of a national, governmental oversight agency. Therefore, professional associations and councils have to form task forces to monitor outcomes that interest them. The rest of the world relies upon the government to provide that oversight. The American Dental Association and others are proposing model guidelines for quality assurance programs. The most important thing that public and private institutions can do is to develop, and conduct in-house, quality assurance programs.Q: Creating scheduled Spark job with Java API I am trying to call
