The results presented indicate that hexokinase, phosphorylase, and phosphoglucomutase activities are regulated differently in malignant cells than in their normal counterparts. In contrast, the activities of glucose-6-phosphatase and pyruvate kinase were not significantly altered. All these enzymes are measurable in crude extracts of the malignant cells and, unlike their corresponding normal counterparts, do not have a pH optimum in the pH 7.5-8.5 range. The alterations in the activity of these enzymes due to stimulation by insulin were also different for normal and malignant cells, and the effects of insulin on glucose consumption were different. An inhibitory effect on the consumption of glucose was observed with concentrations of insulin of only 10-20 mU/ml in the normal cells, whereas in the malignant cells the concentrations of insulin necessary to obtain the same effect were 2-2.5 times lower. Glycogen content was also quantified in the cells; in the normal cells, the intracellular and the total
