The project is now free to anyone in the world who wants to try it out. Named after the late U.S. astronaut Neil Armstrong, the project started as an internal search by HP's Strategic Development group to find a way to change the way the company thinks about technology and other areas of the business. HP launched Moonshot as a membership program for anyone in the world to join – and gave them a discount on a new HP ProBook 5540G notebook and entered them in a global award program to celebrate the launch. For the X prize money, Moonshot aims to build something that will "radically change the way we interact with computers," including the internet of things, connected devices and smarter cities. What HP needs to do is be disruptive. Innovate technology that can make computing and the IoT become a normal part of everyone's life. HP's Moonshot encourages innovation and experimentation in the
