Strossen, P., & Weathersby, E. (eds).. the term resentment. In medicine, it is often necessary to remove unwanted organic tissues, such as accumulated plaque or infected or cancerous tissue, from a patient's body. In order to remove the unwanted tissue, a cutting device may be inserted into the patient's body and manipulated to cut away the unwanted tissue. For example, a cutter may be inserted through a natural body orifice or incision into a patient's body, and moved through or around tissue in order to cut the unwanted tissue away. However, it is often difficult to manipulate such cutting devices through or around the patient's body. For example, manipulation of a cutter through or around the patient's body can be difficult when the tissue around the cutting site is, at best, quite difficult to access, and/or more often very difficult to access. A new study shows that older people are more likely to die early after a heart attack if doctors follow standard guidelines for treating the heart attack, as opposed to a more aggressive approach. The study, published in the journal PLOS ONE, is based on information from more than nine thousand patients, aged 18 to 75, who had had a heart attack. It found that only 40 percent of heart attack patients got the recommended medical therapy for the heart attack, including a combination of four drugs. Of the patients, 8 percent died early, 10 percent died late, and 2 percent were still hospitalized when the study ended. Lower rates of aggressive medical care led to early death for some patients who would have survived with a different treatment regimen. Of patients who were not given aggressive medical care, 30 percent died early. For patients who did get aggressive medical care, the early death rate was only 13 percent. The study suggests that doctors and medical institutions that receive federal funding may be intentionally not giving older people the kinds of medical treatments that would be necessary to save
