

An image in an email is small, thin, and intended to represent a range of formats and sizes, not a single image. SMALL_IMAGE and LARGE_IMAGE concepts involve selection of formatting attributes. Multiple Solution Scales The illustration in Figure 2.4.1 focuses on the use of the DROWSER solution scales to display content from different perspectives. Here, the context is information that the user is viewing from a large computer display (data-solution-scale=large) and from a small mobile device (data-solution-scale=small). The illustration in Figure 2.4.2 shows multiple data visualizations that may be used in a simulation-driven scenario, for example, moving from a high-fidelity simulation to a low-fidelity data view, such as representing a network of agents or an evolution of population in a spreadsheet. The illustration in Figure 2.4.3 shows multiple visualizations that may be used in a workflow-driven scenario. Here, visualizations are used to help an analyst view production data and make a decision about a production-quality stream of data. Data Representation The data formats represent the various ways of representing data in the GDS. Many formats are defined in the GDS. Individual data objects are usually represented with all available attributes, including attributes that might be rarely used. These attributes are listed in the "Missing Attributes" or "Few Attributes" sections of the data definition dictionary (DDD). The Data Representation Parameter The Data Representation parameter determines the representation of objects when the model is read and the data types of attributes in the graphical display. The options include: Each cell in a spreadsheet model has an attribute called the rows. This attribute is tied to a table that shows the location of the data. For example, the data in the table might look like this: Table 2.1.1. Attributes of the address (rows) 4 2 The first row contains the data that spans the first two rows of a spreadsheet. In the same spreadsheet, there is an attribute called columns that is tied to a table that shows the location of the data. For example, the table might look like this: Table 2.1.1. Attributes of the address (columns) 3 0 1 2 3 4 5 6 7 8 9 10 11 12 13 14 15 16 The first row contains the data that spans the first two columns of a spreadsheet. Reporting
