The future of lightweight composites is in support materials such as polymer composites and matrix ceramics. These can replace natural materials by providing specific properties, which is very appealing to the industry. The recent surge of additive manufacturing, which has become widely adopted by industry, is also driving this future trend. Additive manufacturing technologies have emerged as one of the fastest growing technologies in the 21st century. According to the experts, additive manufacturing has the potential to accelerate the transition to sustainable manufacturing in many critical sectors, such as aerospace, automotive, and energy. But, the transition towards additive manufacturing in the aerospace sector may face some challenges, as additive manufacturing may not be as efficient in producing structural components. According to the latest trends, additive manufacturing is not a one-way technology. The research, which was conducted by Amrita University team, shows that, most of the commercially available machines and process recipes are not suitable for producing large-scale applications. Also, as the technology is still at a nascent stage of development, there are hardly any processing options to enhance the performance of the process. The research shows the necessity for developing a better process recipe for 3D printing large-scale metals, which can support the transition towards sustainable manufacturing in the aerospace sector. The team first developed a processing recipe using commercially available Inconel-750 and Ti-6Al-4V alloys (AA7050 and AA5246, respectively), which are representative for aerospace products. Then, they modified the recipe by adding different alloys. With this new recipe, they printed 5-cm-long test specimen using the Selective Laser Melting (SLM) technique. Then, they analyzed the mechanical properties of the specimens, which showed that they are inferior when compared to a conventional mach
