The invention is applicable in particular to coating a mineral substrate, in particular a mineral substrate having a non-uniform composition, by chemical reaction. Examples of mineral substrates are high-purity, high-content substrates of crystal formers, such as quartz substrates for use in manufacturing electronic devices. Conventional chemical vapor deposition (CVD) is a well-known method for coating a surface of a solid, such as a silica substrate, with a chemically resistant layer (a layer in which the composition is substantially the same as that of the substrate). Conventional chemical vapor deposition typically results in a layer having a high concentration of residual carbon. The presence of carbon is undesired, as carbon has a tendency to form carbide species and promote agglomeration in such a layer. It is known that such agglomeration increases the internal stress in the layer. This stress can result in the failure of electronic devices and/or damage the substrate itself. Conventional chemical vapor deposition cannot be used directly for coating a substrate with a coating substance because a protective gas, such as nitrogen, is used to protect the substrate. The protective gas is intended to prevent the release of reactive carbon species. However, in conventional chemical vapor deposition, the protective gas may act as a carbon source and carbon is able to form on the surface. It is also known to apply fluorine compounds, such as fluorine compounds containing fluorine and hydrogen, such as difluoromethane and difluoromethane salts, to a surface of a substrate to promote the formation of a silica surface and/or prevent the formation of

I am trying to implement an algorithm that will search a mountain of data to find a couple of items that I know need to be in a particular relationship to each other. I have a UI page called SearchTask with a couple of controls on it to load items from the database. I have a background task which is looping through that data and checking out those items. I want to display those items on the UI with a "+" next to each item if the item is in a particular relationship with the others. Right now my background task loads everything into a List and my UI gets an event like this: List items = _dataTask.Result; foreach(x item in items) { //event fired from the UI that says this item is in a relationship with //these other items } This gives me a list of items and a flag for which relationships they are in. I then use some lambda expressions and LINQ to decide which items to show on the screen. The problem is that this takes a while to run. It takes around 5 seconds just to load the UI. I am using the Telerik RadDataPager control to paginate the data and it runs in a separate background thread. I really don't want to have to wait 10 seconds for it to load before I can start doing stuff. My question is how can I get the items in the UI so that they are available to the UI thread when I need them? Is there some way to force that background thread to queue the data? A: When you do List items = _dataTask.Result; you are blocking the UI thread until the task is done and then it is received on the UI thread. If the data is not yet available on the UI thread, there is nothing you can do to make it available. One way to avoid this is to create the data in a background thread and do one of the following when the data is available: Use a local cache of the data which is then accessed only from
