The expression of T-cell antigen receptors (TCR) is controlled by allelic variants of the TCR gamma and delta genes. In this study, segments of chicken TCR gamma 1 and delta 1 genes were compared to analyze the relationship between nucleotide sequences and variability in the variable and joining regions and the effect of recombination on diversity. V(D)J recombination caused deletions and nucleotide substitutions in both regions of the TCR delta 1 gene, but only nonspecific nucleotide substitutions occurred in the TCR gamma gene. Two variations of V region segments were observed, a high and a low variability segment, both of which contained tandem repeats. The high variability segment was encoded by gene segments present in two distinct TCR delta 1 alleles. The segment was excluded from the junctional region of both alleles, which apparently contributed to its high diversity. The low variability segment was encoded by a gene segment which was not excluded from either juncture. Nevertheless, the corresponding sequence of the junctional region was not identical, suggesting that diversity was reduced by replacement of repeats with unique sequences. Despite high variability, the TCR delta 1 sequence of more than 100 individuals was identical. Conversely, the TCR gamma 1 gene segment was highly variable among individuals. This has consequences for the analysis of TCR gene sequences obtained from individual bird flocks or
