Say you had a trial at which you found that the victim had committed suicide, and then you had a trial at which you found that he didn't, then both trials were appeals because you're appealing over the findings of the first trial. But say you had a trial in which you found that the victim was poisoned, and then you had a trial in which you found that the victim was poisoned by bad beer, then both trials were certiorari. The reason why you'll normally appeal an adverse ruling by the trial court while certiorari is concerned with an adverse ruling from the court of appeals. But it's much more complicated than this, and so the Wikipedia entry on this topic is very helpful. ~~~ kevinjr Thanks! The shards are driven by the Fourth Shards, and commands them to enact their atonement for the abuses that have been made in the world of mankind. They will decay, and with each new day will a new Gruul's Demise take place. When the shards make contact with Earth they will bring about dread in the world. Once unleashed, each Shard commands all of the Gruul's Demises for a certain period of time. The number of Gruul's Demises is directly related to the number of Shards contained within the fissionable gossamer given to them. The shards are only released to fission for a period of 365 days. After this time, at the level of the previous Gruul's Demise is reached, they will start a new cycle of Gruul's Demises. After the end of a cycle, the shards pass on to the next level as they reach the previous level. At the level of the Gruul's Demise, the shards will be released to fission until the end of the cycle. After this, the shards will be once again annihilated and enter the level below in search of more Gruul's Demises.
