Architecture Package Tutorial (Metric).Q: Difference between starting a http server I have seen websites which start their own http server i.e. with the port number - it seems to add some security I guess. What's the difference between the two approaches i.e. starting with the port number - which is pretty easy and quick starting without the port number - again, is it secure enough? A: The port is probably the best way to protect against being DOS'd or otherwise attacked on your machine. As a general rule, only load the server software that supports your chosen protocol and make sure it listens on a well known port. You're right that if someone connects to your port on your machine, they are able to run their own server process on your machine. That's a little hard to protect against without a very, very strong security posture. You can prevent that by running the webserver on a server that someone can't access without paying for a subscription, and running a web browser on a dedicated computer that can only be accessed through a locked down firewall and proxy. Q: ASP.NET MVC 3 unit testing N-tier app with Nin
