I feel it underlines my key points. I felt LR4 was the best version, but the next iteration they appeared to be aiming for bigger and later. I wanted to wait for the new versions to happen, but it didn't take long for them to start to trickle. As a whole they seem to have made a more logical step forward. But as I said, they announced this at some point and hardly helped me make a decision. In total, I believe that Photoshop is a good program. Upgrades to a new major version are a good thing for software. However, the changes are usually too big to be backwardly compatible, so the only alternative is to compile the version you want. Feels like a monumental pain when you realize that many people could have used that time and money to acquire some other software instead. In addition, the don't-call-it-a-version number can often be misleading and confusing. For example, CS1 was a big deal. From Photoshop 7 on, it was considered an "upgrade" of a previous major version, and upgrading from 7 to CS2 should not be as difficult as upgrading from 1 to 2. Or, at least, that is how Apple did it. I think that more time should be spent on developing core programs, and streamlining the upgrades. If you can put Photoshop and Photoshop Elements together into one resource, and avoid separate online and offline installation, so much the better. However, an advertisement from Apple (first in the form of a motorola) suggested that it does not work that way. Though that makes no sense; let's consider the old PC for a moment - the times we now live in are the ones where consumers are happy to settle for just any old platform that can mount a hard drive and have a DVD-ROM drive. That is no longer true.
