NFI Comparator PC/Windows

- Macro mode allows you to zoom in very close, allowing you to see features that are normally not visible. The main purpose of Macro mode is to enable the selection of small parts of images. By use of a specified focal distance, and with suitable digital zoom, you can, for example, compare the print of a suspect with the image of the victim, or you can search for an object that you are looking for in order to make a comparison. The limits of the zoom settings, which are determined in the camera and in the storage media, are also affected by the amount of light.
- In most cases, you should use Macro mode in comparison images that are to be stored as well as in comparison images that are created with your own eyes. The purpose is to be able to zoom in very close, to see even small details that are in a few pixels. It is therefore advisable that you select the closest possible focal distance and zoom to enable you to take a photo that shows a small part of the image, for example, that of a key or a tag. Macro mode is also suitable for comparison images that are stored. In this case, you will often make a comparison between a stored image and an image that is taken with the camera. By use of the same camera settings, you can make this comparison directly on the camera.
- It is not possible to change the settings on the fly. Therefore, when you use Macro mode, it is important to select the appropriate settings for the light situation, the focal distance and the zoom level before you start shooting. The camera will then always set the settings for the new situation when you have finished shooting.
- This mode is not available for a video camera.
- The frames per second (fps) depends on the camera and the storage medium.
- When you are recording a video, it may be impossible to view the previously recorded video.
- You can only start recording a video when it is not already running.
- No sound can be recorded when recording a video.
- Images can be recorded in JPEG, MPEG, RAW or other formats.
- The selected format may also be stored in the camera, the external storage media and the external storage media or an external storage media reader.
- With the recording of RAW images, it is possible to later create a high-quality image in the RAW format. RAW is only available with the Nikon D7000.
- RAW images may not be visible in the display during RAW recording.
