When you first get started with RAW conversion, you will find it fairly easy to turn off the various options that the iPad uses. I encourage you to try to do that so that you can keep the iOS version from thinking that it's talking to a Mac. There are two settings in particular that you might want to be careful about. The "Color Separation" setting (which is off by default) and the "On-screen Display" setting, which you may not want on. To start, you should know that any time you have a computer with a different architecture than a Mac, its software will be more resource-intensive. A Mac Pro with 64 GB RAM will make a Lightroom catalog run like garbage; a Mac Pro with the same RAM total but 32 GB's of it is fine. Keep that in mind. Lightroom in general, especially when adding new features, will be more resource-intensive. A large catalog probably won't run that badly with 32 GB of RAM. However, a 2 to 3 GB catalog can provide a lot of strain. The takeaway from all of this: light business and even hobby catalogs with around 3GB's of images will work fine with Lightroom 5. Previewing those catalogs will not be terribly lengthy, and any performance issues can be gotten used to. You may also find that the application becomes slower with more images in your catalog. As with Lightroom, you should try to leave preview alone until everything that you want to keep is selected. Then you can click the arrow button at the bottom of the screen to have it preview the selected image on the left side. If you need to see all of the images at once in an album, you can then click on that album in the Albums panel on the left, and it will display them.
