However, before we get into this review, I would like to take a brief moment to highlight how 2018 was a difficult year for digital imaging. The wheels have fallen off the wagon a bit in the industry overall, and I mentioned how camera resellers, who buy and sell used gear, are feeling the pain. Resellers are in a similar position to the photo-enthusiast crowd, if you will. Many enthusiast shooters are simply not getting their money's worth out of their gear. In 2018, I saw these sorts of problems with a few camera package sales, but the biggest impact was found among photography film-based equipment. Most film enthusiasts are not aware of how expensive it can be to rent out camera boxes and lenses, and that's a big problem. It seems like a natural trade-off to invest a fair amount of money into film gear to save a significant portion of the cost of purchase. The condition of the vintage lenses is another area that is often affected. Someone purchases a Sigma 50mm f/1.4 EX and then later finds a Canon M50 20mm f/2 that's also under $1,000. Of course, not all of these problems are camera-centric. The prices of new lenses continue to rise, too. When you look around, you'll find even more examples of used lenses that are significantly cheaper than new. Accordingly, you should be careful about buying used gear, and you should definitely avoid reselling it. Whenever you're about to purchase something, you'll have to be more than just a consumer shopping for a one-time-use item. Photography equipment is a not so simple investment.
