This study investigated the prevalence of anxiety and depression in patients with chronic pain, and examined the correlates of depression and anxiety in patients with chronic pain. Data were collected from 207 patients with chronic pain by using measures of health status, pain severity, psychological and psychosocial functioning, and anxiety and depression. Findings indicated that 67% of the subjects met the definition of high levels of depression and anxiety. Depressed patients reported greater pain severity and poorer functioning than nondepressed patients. Depressed and anxious patients reported more pain, poorer physical and social functioning, and more depressive symptoms than nondepressed patients. Results from stepwise regression analyses indicated that both pain severity and degree of disability were significant predictors of level of depression and anxiety, with depressive symptoms predicting greater levels of depression. These results suggest that high levels of depression and anxiety are common in chronic pain patients, and they can be predicted by pain severity and degree of disability.The 500-unit Circle M30-3-
