On Tuesday, council voted unanimously to keep the current school trustee selection system — which gives each ward between two and four nominees — but admitted it is not "flawless." "Last time I checked, the human body wasn't flawless," said Coun. Jean Swanson, a vocal opponent of the current system. "We now have a larger percentage of people that are not part of the process." After the motion passed, Mayor Marianne Matichuk said she supported the motion because the issue "comes down to the whims of the mayor and the councillors." "I believe the city council has been clear for more than a year that we want the new school trustee system to be chosen by an election of the city council and not by the mayor and the councillors," Matichuk said in an interview. However, a majority of councillors said they would not agree to a "proportionality" system — if the ward with the lowest vote gets just two per cent more votes than the ward with the most votes — if the mayor asked for it. It is the same system that was used for mayor, but for three councillor positions instead of one. Matichuk said the system is not proportional, and called for it to be dropped. "What will be the fallback if you can't have proportionality? There are other things we have that are proportional that don't cost the taxpayer a dime — like the mayor," she said. Matichuk said she would be happy to drop the mayor and councillors from the election process altogether. "I think that's the key problem that I have with the current system — we don't have elected school trustees," Matichuk said.
