[Atypical angiomyolipomas at the University Hospital of Mendoza, Argentina: a clinicopathological study].
To study the morphological features and clinical characteristics of atypical angiomyolipomas (AML) at the University Hospital of Mendoza. We studied 11 patients operated for AML at our hospital and reviewed the clinical records and the histological and ultrasonographic reports of their lesions. The diagnosis of AML was established on the basis of typical findings on histological examination, positive immunostaining for HMB-45, and ultrasonography revealing the presence of hypo-echogenic nodules that were invaded by an intralesional, echogenic, non-homogeneous, inhomogeneous, or heterogeneous echogenic mass. Hematoxylin and eosin and immunohistochemical stains were used to study the morphological and clinical features of AML. Eleven patients, 8 women and 3 men (median age: 42.5 years), underwent surgery for suspected renal angiomyolipomas. The clinical diagnosis of AML had been established by renal ultrasonography in all cases. All tumors showed fat, vascular, and smooth muscle components. Ten of them were of the macro-oncocytic type, one was macrofocal papillary AML, and one papillary AML with arborizing vessels. Three tumors were larger than 7 cm in maximum diameter. The mass characteristics and echogenicity were compatible with AML in 10 cases, although one case was composed of a macro-oncocytic AML and renal angiomyolipoma, associated with renal cell carcinoma. There were no other signs of angiomyolipoma in the other tumors. AML can be a difficult diagnosis, because of its clinical, morphological, and immunohistochemical overlap with renal angiomyolipoma. Microscopy is usually required for confirmation, but many tumors with suspect features may be managed surgically. Why it's a bad idea to have a bank account in the cloud - blivet
