If you are entirely new to Photoshop, Lightroom, or digital photography, waiting to buy the software is not always the best idea. Adobe offers a free trial, which is a nice deal. Adobe has also released its professional evaluation program, which gives a thorough assessment of its main product. The evaluation program provides the ability to download the evaluation version and include trials of all its major applications. Basically, it's a good way to find out what all you can do with these software products. The alternative to these free trials is to learn how to use Lightroom 4 and Photoshop manually. In this case, you might buy Lightroom 4 and Photoshop because you will find yourself using the software much more often than you would have done so had you not both purchased them. Alternatively, you can purchase a copy of Photoshop and install Lightroom 4 and vice versa. After that, you'll be able to work as efficiently as if you were using two separate applications. This time around, Elements has a new feature called Film Color 1.0. It will analyze the color of your image and bring the colors to life. Colors not used are replaced with a custom color. For instance, I photographed a scene of a man in a suit. His suit was brown, but it had a lot of contrast. I chose a color in the middle of his brown and indigo spectrum. It was replaced and everything else the same. This new feature is great. I think they need to get the colors a little closer though. I always have this problem with adobe products. In the beginning the colors are great, but after awhile they go bad.
