The effect of the eruption of deciduous teeth on the eruption of permanent teeth was evaluated using panoramic radiographs. One hundred fifty three children examined at the Department of Orthodontics at Yamagata University School of Medicine, who had completed the deciduous dentition, were selected. The subjects were divided into two groups according to the eruptive characteristics of the permanent teeth. Group D included 98 children in whom at least one permanent tooth could erupt, while group ND included 55 children without erupted permanent teeth. The ratio of maxillary central incisors with erupted permanent teeth was significantly higher in group D than in group ND (96.0% in D vs 42
